Subject: EPA Identifying Anresco and Micro-Tracers as `PRPs at Yosemite Slough,SF

Attn: Mr. Matthew Low

Dear Mr. Low;

I believe neither of my businesses have any responsibility for pollutants found at Yosemite Slough.

We were identified as a PRP because we are registered as using hazardous materials and because on one occasion the City of San Francisco found a very small amount of cadmium in our discharge water.

Anresco is a commercial analytical laboratory focused on foods testing, though we do test for pesticide residues, PCBs, heavy metals, microbiology etc. (website: www.anresco.com) but we dispose of our waste solvents and unneeded hazmat chemicals legally and have documentation to support this. Our water discharge is monitored by the City and they have tested on many occasions and only once in many years did they find anything significant- the cadmium once.

Micro-Tracers primarily manufactures analytical tracers for feeds using iron and FD&C food colors. We also do manufacture selenium additives to animal feeds but we do not discharge any water and we dispose of all hazamat wastes legally and have documentation to support this.

I do not see where I should need to be a member of any Responsible Parties Group. Please advise why I should participate and also any likely legal or financial liabilities I may be faced with if I do or do not participate. I do know a nearby building, 2111 Jennings, housed an environmental testing lab for some years in the 1980's that went out of business and would have performed extensive testing of hazardous wastes etc. and since they failed they may not have properly controlled their hazmat materials. The landlord still owns the building as well as 2115 Jennings which had a 550 gallon underground storage tank and had worked I believe as an auto repair shop. I can provide you contact information for the building owner if you want this.

I am on vacation next week but will check emails while on vacation.

Please reply when you have time.

With best wishes.
